

Multilateralism in Uncertain Times - Challenges and Opportunities in Transatlantic Relations

VM5 Seminar; Wednesdays, 2pm-4pm (s.t.), beginning on October 20, 2021; Room: 019.

Seminar-Outline:

Where are transatlantic relations headed in the face of a seemingly faltering liberal international order that faces domestic challenges on both sides of the Atlantic and that has to address rising competition from China and Russia? How has American engagement in world affairs evolved in recent history and what role do European countries see for themselves in a multipolar world? We will take into account different theoretical perspectives on transatlantic relations in flux set in an ever-changing international context, before moving on to explore explanatory factors for transatlantic turbulences as discussed in selected empirical studies. We will move on to review and assess different policy areas aiming to carve out challenges as well as opportunities for a strained partnership that is trying to recover from the impact of the Trump-Administration. We will discuss these topics together with students from the UNC at Chapel Hill in transatlantic joint live sessions on Zoom. Overall, this class aims to account for different perspectives on transatlantic multilateralism in order to prepare students to explore their own research interests pertaining to these broad topics. Hence, the course is set up as a research seminar aiming to foster and enhance the student's own research agendas by teaching the principles of working research designs in political science.

Requirements for Participation:

Completed BM5; Extensive grasp of the English and German language.

Studienleistung (term assignments OPTION 1):

- I. One essay in a module of your own choosing (except for module IV; 1.300 words + list of references; please refer to the handout "essay" on Stud.IP)
